

i believe the observer pattern would be the best choice, it is most suitable because the application requires a one-to-many relationship where a control button object notifies multiple regular buttons about direction events. Regular buttons must be able to dynamically register and unregister themselves to receive notifications, which is a core feature of the Observer pattern. This approach ensures loose coupling between the event sender and receivers, allows runtime subscription management, and cleanly separates event handling logic from button behavior.